

A Letter from the Superintendent, Greg Hughes

One of the many special things about Khartoum American School is the way in which we embrace all members of our community. Our community consists of people from all over the world, from different races, and religions all living harmoniously together in one happy entity. Our school embraces the fact that we are so diverse and in fact celebrates this in our everyday teaching. We also take the concept of acceptance and inclusion further than most international schools by admitting children with special needs, and giving these students a place in our community also.

One of the highlights of my week is catching up with one of our Grade 10 boys, Mohamed, who is a student with cerebral palsy. Mohamed is good student, but more importantly he is a really nice young man and while his impairment precludes him from playing sports and other physical activities he is always a great person to share a joke with or to discuss any multitude of current affairs events.

Mohamed's big love is American football and he is a fanatical supporter of the Washington Redskins. Earlier in the year we decided to extend Mohamed's passion to others and got a group together to help him celebrate each and every Redski
